Keeping Track of Shots

Ned Cordery

In the November/December issue of Movie Makers I wrote about the preparation for editing and the need to know our material and where to find it. Recently I came upon a piece of software that is designed for cataloging DV, named CatDV. This is one of the best finds I have made in ages and it has transformed and simplified my cataloging and at the same time made it more complete and interesting. I am still at the learning phase but am impressed enough to share my experience to date and hope to hear from other users. There are two versions of CatDV, a Professional Edition and a Personal Edition. I am using the Personal Edition

What does CatDV do? It can be used in two ways, first to collect and store information from within an editing program and secondly to log information from DV tapes and store it as both data and as highly compressed thumbnail movies with sound.

I use Cinestream 3.1 on a PC with Windows XP Home but the Windows version is suitable for use with Windows 98, NT4, 2000, ME and XP. CatDV works with the best known NLE programs. There are two versions for the Mac for, OS9 and OS X.

The CatDV program is downloaded from their site at www.squarebox.co.uk the personal version costs $80 and to build logs from tapes via firewire it is necessary to download an additional plug-in from an Australian site, www.abstractplane.com.au at a cost of about $30. There is a 30 day trial version of CatDV available as a download. I am no computer expert and approach these exercises with a degree of fear and trepidation but everything went smoothly and carefully following the instructions everything worked. I checked and all the other programs on my computer still functioned. If you want to read up on the program before you commit the manual can be downloaded as a .pdf file and is packed with information. There is also a 6 page .pdf file "White Paper" that gives a detailed overview of the program and its func-

From the Editor

I have made a difficult decision. In the middle of editing my latest documentary on the U.S.S. Nautilus, I have finally realized that the quality of the audio for my interviews is extremely poor. I have adjusted the EQ, boosted volume, removed the worst parts, added a music bed, ran the audio through a filter in Cool Edit Pro, but still the echo and extraneous noise hurts the audio. I recorded the interviews in the Sub-force museum located in Groton, Connecticut and have a fantastic backdrop. However, the noise from tour groups passing through overwhelms my interviewees.

So I've made the decision to redo the interviews, provided the participants are willing. And right now they have indicated they will redo the interviews. I still have some production money left for this production so costs will be taken care of. I can schedule the travel and interview so it won't conflict with my work. I think about the valuable lesson I have learned about controlling audio in the field. Individual microphones for each interview and conduct the interview in a quiet location. Had I been producing the documentary for a client or another producer, I might have found myself out of a job. The story and visuals are worthy of this retake and I am going to get it right this time.

This has not been a good festival year for my work. My documentaries have not been accepted into one competition so far. The AMPS competition is looming. As the festival chair for the past two years it seems a little strange not to be doing it this year. I have a short piece regarding two artists. Should I enter it? What if it didn't place? The same arguments still exist out there regarding amateur versus professional. I wish the new festival director all the best in running this year's competition and I look forward ward to seeing the winning productions.

Thank you to everyone who have been submitting articles. They are great additions to our newsletter, please keep them coming.

Continuity

Roger Garretson

I was reading a book written by George Cushman called "Movie Making in 18 Lesson" and came away with a higher degree of respect for those folks that used to make movies a few years ago. Their life was so much harder than we now have it, audio recorded with film was difficulty, adding special effects was very difficult, editing was horrendous, film speed was so low, a huge amount of light was needed and the list goes on and on.

One chapter in his book is just as applicable today as when it was written (1971), the topic is Continuity.

Let me quote:

"There are many kinds of continuity in motion picture making, but we shall confine our discussion to only 12 of them, which are:

1. continuity of story or theme
2. continuity of subject matter.
3. continuity of thought
4. continuity of interest
5. continuity of time

VIDEO GOES TO WAR Whatever your views about the war, If you watch the TV news of the war, you must be amazed at the live and essentially real time scenes.

The embedded correspondents talking to us on videophones are not entirely new. We saw it once in awhile, in Bosnia and a bit more in Afghanistan. I wrote an article about the use of videophones some time ago when it was first used in Afghanistan. Jerky pictures notwithstanding it gives us a presence never before achieved by war correspondents. Now it is everywhere. Even President Bush uses it to confer visually with world leaders.

- Why is it so jerky? Well it isn't, if the subject in focus and the background is not moving much or fast. That is because the frame rate, number of frames or pictures per second, must be greatly reduced from the 30 frames per second we are used to with our NTSC video or 25 frames per second in the PAL system used in the United Kingdom and most European countries. With not much motion the digital picture does not have to be redrawn as frequently and less digital data is required.
- The reason slower frame rates such as 15 or even much slower are used is to reduce the vast size of the file of digital data needed to transmit each frame of a video picture. This digital file or data must be transmitted along either landlines or by radio to local receivers for onward transmittal to us via satellite. The speed and volume of data is limited by the available bandwidth and other technical factors. Think of it as pouring sand through a funnel;

you can only get so many grains of sand through per second.

- Why are the pictures so grainy? Because of the limitations noted above, each element of the picture is larger than regular we usually see on TV. In other words the resolution of the picture is much lower than the TV picture we are used to seeing. The difference in resolution is much greater than the difference between DV and VHS.
- Jerky and grainy or not, the pictures from these videophones bring the battlefield right into our home TVs in a manner never before possible.
- The regular television pictures you see are either from fixed sites or the military equivalent of the mobile TV news vans we see at every news event. They use bulky TV transmitters, too heavy for field use, to contact a satellite for onward transmission to us.
- The above hasn't much to do with our hobby of moviemaking. However in terms of videography it is interesting to see how well the video pictures from moving trucks, tanks and Humvees are stabilized.
- We are used to the weatherman video tricks of zooming around Southern California with 3D maps to show us our weather forecasts. But satellite image maps we see on the TV war news, when the specialists and retired military officers try to explain the war's progress, are really fascinating.
- These views of the Iraqi terrain are from satellites and are very current. They have resolution sufficient to clearly see cars in the streets of Baghdad when they zoom in. Through the magic of computer manipulation these satellite views can be zoomed in and out and panned around or rotated. Zooms can range from the area of the Middle East to residential streets and buildings in the cities of Iraq. They are not moving pictures but the way they are zoomed and moved they almost seem like real time moving pictures.

- I was particularly interested because my latest movie project utilizes satellite images of sites around the world, which I captured from the Internet. I use them to orient various travel movie scenes. They are static views and nowhere near the resolution of these news scenes. When I zoom them in close they soon become pixilated
- I noted the Logo on one of the TV scenes and looked it up on the Internet and found that a program and similar scenes are available commercially. Available scenes are listed and many are updated frequently. I don't know that the Iraqi scenes are available.
- I may order the program to see if I can use it to make a follow on version of my "Planet Earth" movie, not with the Iraqi area of course. I'm afraid though that the learning curve may be more than I want to take on. If you are interested in this program the web site is: www.earthviewer.com. They offer programs for personal, education, and commercial use.
- This probably does not interest most amateur moviemakers, but for those of us who have limited ability to go out and shoot real video scenes, it might be of interest to use with some of your older footage.

NAB Report

Matt Jenkins

Every year the National Association of Broadcasters holds a huge convention in Las Vegas. While I attended this year's event, this story actually starts the week before in Tulsa, Oklahoma.

Every year the Oklahoma Association of Broadcasters holds an annual convention that includes the states broadcasting college students. As president of the Oklahoma Broadcast Education Association, I was included in this year's planning and execution of the student day. The day went well and I found myself seated during the lunch at the speaker's table with David Layer, an engineer with the NAB and Eddie Fritz, President of the NAB. Fritz has been the president of the NAB for over twenty years, leading the growth of the annual convention from 25,000 attendees to 92,000 attendees in 2002.

Eddie was cordial but distant. After all who was I? An unknown academic from a no-name town in Oklahoma. However, I had met the engineer, David Layer before and I was relating an engineering story regarding a friend of mine who lives in the Mississippi Delta.

Suddenly, Eddie Fritz, came alive. Apparently he started in radio in the Delta and we knew many of the same people. So I wasn't such an unknown after all!

NAB is known for being a venue for showcasing new and innovative products. This year the big announcement is the release of Final Cut Pro Edition 4. I managed to see a Final Cut Pro 4 demonstration and all this AVID user can say is WOW!

Included in the demonstration was a new "live titler." The user can select pre-created movement for the graphics. Although, it was pointed out to me later that this exists in earlier versions of Final Cut Pro, I was still impressed. Also demonstrated was a new music creation program. The user can select drum tracks, bass tracks and assorted instrument tracks and easily manipulate them to fit the style and feel of the production.

A new DVD authoring program was also unveiled. It is my understanding that this is separate from the Final Cut Pro editing program. However, it was an impressive program in its own right, allowing the user to create intricate menu pages for the DVD. Final Cut Pro will take you from initial edit to final mastered DVD.

The down side was that Apple didn't provide any spec sheets. Interested people had to register for an after-convention contact. Also, I will say that there were more people at the AVID booth than at Apple.

In other NAB news, in a NAB interview, Eddie Fritz indicated an all-star line-up of speakers including Barry Diller, Michael Eisner, Cokie Roberts and Don Hewitt. I would have loved to hear Hewitt speak after his recent removal from "60 Minutes."

This year marked the first time that the entire convention was housed under one roof at the Las Vegas Convention Center. So the shuttle bus ride to the Sands Convention Center was no longer necessary.

While I didn't see Eddie Fritz at the NAB, it was interesting to visit the convention.

6. continuity of mood
7. continuity of build-up
8. continuity of suspense
9. continuity of lighting (and exposure)
10. continuity of character
11. continuity of location and background
12. continuity of action

These twelve kinds of continuity could be divided into three general classifications or groups. The first five are psychological and relate to our understanding of a certain situation. The next four are emotional and affect the audience in that manner.

The last three are visual, for primarily we see them.

It is surprising that in most discussions of film continuity, only the twelfth-continuity of action- is considered. This is an important one, true, but a film that possess only continuity of action can still be a worthless effort."

I am not going to try to quote all of George's narrative, because it is several pages long, but here are some important points as he presents them.

Story- confine your action to what is included in the story and cut everything else.

Subject Matter- "Continuity of subject matter deals mostly with a specific sequence, whereas continuity of story or them refers to the whole film."

Thought- Continuity of thought suffers when too many cutaways or similar devices are used.

ANNOUNCING THE EVENT OF THE YEAR

Joint Festival for TEN BEST of the WEST (TBW)

AMERICAN MOTION PICTURE
SOCIETY (AMPS)

October 9-11, 2003
Holiday Inn, Buena Park,
California

The Southern California Association of Amateur Movie Clubs (SCAAMC) has BIG plans for you! An entertaining, educational and informative program has been scheduled.

Activities will include presentations by exceptional speakers, well-versed and experienced in film/video production techniques, creativity and equipment use. There will be screening sessions throughout the festival to present films and videos from all of the individual contests. In addition to all award-winning movies, an assortment of the entries from each contest will be shown.

Something new is being offered to those attending the festival this year. SCAAMC will be hosting a special contest. Come early, bring your camcorder and during the day on Thursday, October 9, make a two-minute (or less), on-the-spot video of the replica of Independence Hall located at Knott's Theme Park. The entries will be screened and judged during the festival. Sign up for the world famous chicken dinner at Knott's, too. See separate flyer for details.

Our event will culminate at the Saturday evening Banquet where Contest Awards will be presented by each organization. The whole weekend will be a great time to make new friends and renew old acquaintances while you socialize with your fellow film/video enthusiasts.

To keep costs down, breakfasts, lunches and Friday dinner will be on your own. The hotel has a restaurant, and there are several eateries nearby. We'll have restaurant information in your registration pack when you check in with us.

We are offering you an outstanding value for this event – Only $35 (US) per person for registration, if postmarked by September 24, 2003 ($40 after 9/24). See the Registration Form for further price information.

The festival location is the Holiday Inn Buena Park Hotel & Convention Center, 7000 Beach Boulevard, Buena Park, CA 90620. Phone is (714) 522-7000. We have a special TBW room rate of $69 per night. Ask for the Ten Best of the West convention rate. Make your reservations by September 18, 2003. If you want to be close to our meeting room, request the building with the Penthouse – because that's where we'll be.

Before or after the festival, there are plenty of things to do in the Southern California area. Our hotel has a shuttle to several tourist attractions in the neighborhood, including Knott's Theme Park. Here are some suggestions of other venues – Disneyland and the new Disney California Adventure and Downtown Disney – Medieval Times Dinner and Tournament – The Queen Mary – Aquarium of the Pacific – Universal Studios – Richard Nixon Library – Gene Autry Museum of Western Heritage – Tour city sights such as Hollywood, Beverly Hills, Olvera Street, the Sunset Strip, Farmers Market – the Getty Museum – Catalina Island – and on and on.

Amateur Vs. Pro

Walt Gilmore

Having spent some twenty years in the film business and now working as an amateur I am constantly asked, "How would the Pros do it?" or more basically, "What is the difference between an amateur and a pro?" To me, Movie Making is story telling and there is no difference in a good amateur movie or a good pro movie except for the scale of the story telling.

In a professional environment there is money available, lots of money. I mean the last feature I worked on was a "little" film with a budget of only three million dollars. With the manpower that money can buy, you would expect a great movie, but it wasn't. And for that film we had a cast of name actors, a crew of hundreds of people and especially built sets.

So as amateurs we don't have the money or the manpower to do big, controlled scenes but we have an advantage over pros. That advantage is that we control everything in the film directly and can do anything we can imagine exactly the way we want.

The pros start with one person's idea written into a script. That idea is sold to producer who asks for changes as he sees the story. The producer hires a director who has his changes and they hire actors who bring their changes to the characters in the story. Then there is the cameraman, wardrobe people, prop persons, etc. all who see the story slightly differently from the original writer and make small contributions which sometimes all come together to make a great movie but often ends up making a bad movie.

The only thing that saves a movie is good story telling and either a pro or an amateur can tell a good story. In the case of a pro film, the story teller can be any one or a combination of key people keeping every member of the cast and crew doing their very best to tell that story, on film, as well as it can be. And any amateur can do the same, if they can start with a good, clear story and make each shot and scene as clear and correct as it can be.

That means that each shot is not "close enough" but is "right." If the pan is not smooth do it again - right. Each cut should be a transition, which leads to the next shot seamlessly. But most importantly each shot must lead the audience through the story. The music, the narration, the sound effects and the dialog must all work together and lead the audience through the story.

One of my own one-minute videos involved two flags. That one-minute production took five days to shoot before I felt it was "right." The basic problem was to "animate" the two flags. My first two ideas did not work well; only 3 cuts from the first day's shooting are in the final cut. Four additional day's work each added a few angles to the film until I managed to catch the flags movement in "lifelike" moments. This was a luxury I had as an amateur over a pro who has to produce a set number of minutes of story each day with costs running thousands of dollars a day.

There is one area where a pro can teach us amateurs - take criticism as a learning tool NOT as a personal insult. There is an old, old saying in the industry: "It's ONLY a movie!" Often I see amateurs, some very good, who can only see one way to put a film together - their way. Well, sometimes not everyone follows my way of telling a story. Hearing another's concept of what I am trying to say can show me where I have lost the audience. Now this information does not necessarily tell me how to fix it but it will show me where I have a problem and where I need to make the story clearer. Maybe a scene or shot needs to be extended; perhaps a confusing shot needs to be dropped; would changing the order of shots be clearer; or is a closer angle needed for emphasis? Fortunately, we have many, many ways of telling a story in our bag of tricks.

And this is something we can do as well as any pro; all we have to do is use our imagination to tell our story.

Interest- Keep the interest of the viewer in mind and don't switch from point to point.

Time- also called chronological continuity and if it isn't correct can cause a lot of trouble.

Mood- Continuity of the mood being established is essential if that mood is to be seriously felt by the audience.

Build Up- Similar to Mood, but here we relate to the method of achieving the emotional peak we are after.

Suspense- Much like mood and build up must be maintained by consistent scenes that relate to the desired objective.

Lighting and Exposure- A lack of consistent lighting and/or exposure can destroy the true feeling and continuity.

Character- Characters should be created promptly, and all their actions and deeds should be consistent with the character.

Location- Must be consistent from scene to scene.

tions, but aimed at the professional user.

What have I done so far? My biggest task is logging shots on tapes so I set to work to catch up on this seemingly never ending task. Put the tape in the player, open up CatDV and then Live Capture, manually start the player and then hit start in the Live Player window, go and have coffee. At the end of the hour save and I have a mountain of information about each clip plus a lo-res playable mini-picture and sound. Each clip starts with a "Poster" frame that identifies the clip visually, if I don't like the frame selected I can change it. Then laid out in a printable table under a range of headings are the obviously useful information, t/c in, t/c out, length of clip, date shot, frame rate, aspect ratio, aperture etc, etc. Plus a mountain of information that meets more arcane needs. Click on the individual clip in the table and another window opens in which the Preview can be played back and comments added, my own numbering applied and the poster frame changed. When all is complete then I write to a CD R for storage and print out the table - there are a number of alternative of layouts available. Want to find a shot of a deer in a canyon? Check the printouts, identify the reel number e.g. 235, put the CD in the computer, open CatDV, open reel 235 select the shot, open the preview and play. No racing back and forth along tapes, no wear on heads and transports.

The files are amazingly small, a one hour tape with all the data and the compressed picture and sound is a file of just 290 kilobytes (yes I do mean kb). At first I thought that the files were referencing information on my hard drives, but no, when cleaned of all vide/sound information the review picture/sound files played back perfectly from my CD R store of CatDV files! I was surprised at how small the files are so contacted CatDV who were equally surprised, so no explanation but it works for me.

I am at the early stages of using the program and have just logged about 15 tapes so far but I can see its potential and recommend it if you are faced with a mountain of DV tapes and want to know what you have on them.
